

Undisturbed prairie, glade, savanna, forest and wetland natural communities still exist on public lands in the Kansas City metro area.

These beautiful wild lands offer us a place for solace, a place to teach our children about what was here before there was a city, and a place for native plants and wildlife to thrive. These wild places are our biological heritage - and they need our help.

WildLands is a coalition of organizations, educators, businesses and individuals, established to conserve, protect and restore these amazing remnant natural communities by involving the citizens of the Kansas City metro area in the care of these lands – wild places that represent Kansas City's natural heritage.

The WildLands are all around you!

Discover some of the natural communities in your own backyard and rediscover your natural sense of place.

Get Involved!

Volunteer

Kansas City WildLands sponsors community restoration workdays at natural community sites throughout the metro area. Volunteers remove invasive trees and shrubs, work to control exotic plants, gather seed from native plants for restorations, and other activities.

Volunteering at a WildLands workday is a great learning experience for organized groups and individuals alike. WildLands also offers organizations the opportunity to adopt specific sites for ongoing conservation.
